PLIRTATION IN THE TROPICS.

[The Highland Sentinel contains the follow ing odd and graceful little idyl, which is too dainty to be neglected by the tasteful gleaner of fugitive verse:

Once I had a little sweetheart
In the land of the Malay:
Such a little yellow sweetheart,
Warm and peerless as the day
Of her own dear sunny island,
Keimah, in the far, far East,
Where we sucked the luscious mango—
Elves together in the feast.

Such a little copper sweetheart
As my Golu ne'er was found,
With her hair all blue-black streaming
O'er her to the very ground.
And her eyes! her eyes were heaven!
Changing swift from light to cloud,
And her dress was garment fitting
Such a fairy to enshroud,

"Twas enough for little Golu;
No more raiment did she need
Than the milky, budding breadfruit,
Or the lily of the mead;
And she was my little sweetheart
Many a sunny summer day,
When we ale the sweet guavas
In the land of the Malay.

Life was Isughing then. Ah, Golu,
Do you think of that old time,
And of all the tales I told you
Of my colder Western clime?
Do you think how happy were we
Whon we salled to strip the palm,
And we made a latteen arbor
Of the boat-sail in the calm?

They may call you semi-savage—
Golu, I cannot forget
How I poised my little sweetheart
Like a copper statustte.
Now my path lies through the cities,
But they cannot drive away
My sweet dreams of little Golu
And the land of the Malay.

WITH GUSTAVE DORE.

when he cafe, I did not recognize him at first; for in those five brief years his appearance had undergone a very marked change—so marked, indeed, that, when he held out his hand to me, with a smile, and said, "Do you not know me any more, my friend? I am Dore," I felt inclined almost to question his words. What! Young in years, yet Gustave Dore had grown oid. His face was deeply furrowed. His woice had grown busky. His smile was sad, and an air of depression and metancholy seemed to have permanently settled upon his countenance.

and still I long to get away from it."
"What hinders you from traveling?"
I ventured to remark, with a smile.
"Nothing special, indeed," he replied, "but I cannot make up my mind whither to go."
"Bah!" I laughed, "the world is wide.

The truth then leaked out—that M.
Dore, for some time past, had been thinking of undertaking a voyage round "A splendid idea!" I exclaimed, wishing to cheer him up, "French art can only gain thereby."

"But," he said, "what I want to do is to travel in a sailing vessel. I want to see the Arctic see, and I want to go to Australia. I am bound to see all that is grand in North America; and all that, you know, will take years, which I may not have to spare."

The last few words he uttered in s sombre a tone that they sounded like a prediction of his own premature death.

Anxious to change the subject, I told him about my own travels on the western coast of Africa. From the monosyllabic manner in which he answered me every now and then, I saw plainly that he took but little interest in what I that he took but little interest in what related to him.

"You see," I said, gaily, "I had to rough it, for my means were quite limited; but a rich man like you—"
"What do you call a rich man?" he asked, with a merry twinkle in his fine eyes.

"One who, like you, can easily earn one hundred thousand francs a year. Why, you can build yourself a magnificent yacht, and go in it from one end of the world to the other."

Here I found something else that bothered M. Dore when dreaming of his contemplated voyage around the world. He could never set foot on a ship with-out suffering severely from sea-sickness. Like Czar Nicholas, of Russia, he loves the sea, despite the cruelty with which it treats him whenever he ventures out upon it. One day he told me he had been sick for weeks in consequence of a trip across the Channel.

I told him there was no remedy against sea-sickness, but that probably he would soon overcome it. "Gladly would I go to New York to-morrow," he would I go to New York to morrow," he said, "but for my aversion to this nan-seating sickness." His young wife, he added, was greatly in favor of the scheme, because she believed that his depression of spirits would be remedied by so thorough a change of air and places. She had bravely promised to accompany him, even if he took her to the North Pole, or to the cannibal islands.

At this both of we language heartly.

At this both of us laughed heartily.

M. Dore rose from the chair, shook hands with me, and left the place. As he opened the door, I saw that he heaved a sigh, and that his face had resumed its sombre expression. - Translated from La Petite Revue de Paris, for Appleton's Journal.

PAREPA ROSA.

Little did I think, when I entered the Cafe Dufour, the other day at four o'clock in the afternoon, that I should have Gustave Dore as a companion at the small table on which I took my dinner. We had been old acquaintances in times gone by, when the young artist was still poor, and when he had to draw his wonderful aketches in a small room in the Rue Bernardin. He then looked the very picture of health, gayety and intelligence, and I believe I never saw him at that time without a smile on his lips, which lent a peculiar charm to his handsome face. In fact, of all the rising, struggling talents of that period in Paris, young Dore seemed to look forward to the future with the most sanguine expectations, and the firmest belief in his own destiny. Everybody liked him, everybody sympathized with him and everyhody seemed to rejoice in his triumphs at much and as heartily as he did himself.

Having been abroad since 1868, I had not seen Dore since that time, and, when he took a seat opposite to mine at the table in the cafe, I did not recognize him at first; for in those five brief years his appearance had undergone a very little trades on the head of different trades. little turban on the head of different colored tarletanes, very bright, with a flower stack in the front part of it for the slaves, and a beautiful jeweled branch for the ladies. They looked at us very curiously, and put their hands first to their lips, then to their foreheads, as a welcome. The room we were ushered into was about twice as large as Steinway Hall, with a large bird cage in the middle, divans all around, and looking glasses, and two large tables. The slaves brought us a upon his countenance.

He noticed my surprise, and, as we large tables. The slaves brought us a large tables. The slaves brought us a large tables. The slaves brought us a lighted pipe each of two yards in length, all the stem wrought in gold, and the mouth piece of a large piece of amber, if you had been very sick, or as if you had undergone much trouble."
